Dissertation Research

An Empirical Exploration of Information Processing Focusing on Attitude Accessibility, Cross-Activation, and Informational Context. This research is designed to map how individuals process political information. Changes in the accessibility of respondents' attitudes are measured as a result of a specified stimulus, or "prime." The measure of attitude accessibility in the wake of a given "prime" allow for the study of the cross-activation between respondents' attitudes concerning political actors and those dealing with political institutions, as well as the effects of changing informational contexts. Funded by National Science Foundation Dissertation Improvement Grant (SES-9809223).
